

Prompts for your perusal

Sometimes there is nothing more off putting than a blank page and no idea where to start. Here are some prompts for you to use, any style, any length, any genre. It's up to you. This project is not for submitting or feedback – just a little toolbox to dip into when you don't know where to start. These pieces, shall make good reading and sharing pieces when we meet in person, so start filling your folders with short, experimental pieces, suitable to share.

- Write about a sound or a silence that won't go away.
- Write about the house you moved into and loved, until you met your neighbour.
- Write about the flat you moved into and hated, until you met your neighbour.
- Write about a broken mirror.
- Write about a magic mirror.
- Write about how a very small problem for you, will become a very big problem for someone else.
- Write about walking into your kitchen and finding something on the table that shouldn't be there.
- Write about why you entered an area that said, 'No Entry' and describe the outcome.
- Write an invitation you accepted and then regretted.
- Write about a gift that arrived from someone you cut ties with.
- Write about a childhood memory that is perhaps unusual or untypical.
- Write about the worst job you've ever had.

These 12 prompts should keep you going for a wee while and I look forward to hearing them when we finally meet up in person – which will hopefully be soon.
