

Further information

Britain's sense of humour was pivotal to staying positive during the dark days of the second World War. Radio, film, poster campaigns, information films and stage shows all contributed to the resilient morale of the nation, ensuring a perky defiance against the enemy. Steve, an old friend who has previously visited Oundle and District u3a to give talks on Spike Milligan and Victoria Wood returns to tell us how Britain's sense of humour developed during World War II. His talk will include clips of the top comedians of the day, as well as many other examples of wartime entertainment.
